SAFETY FOR THE SEA LION

At last the sea lion on the Oregon coast has come again into his own. For years this innocent creature has had a bounty on his head and has been shot at, blown up and otherwise destroyed by one or another of the various devices and stratagems that man's ingenuity has conceived.

It all began when the creature was charged with the crime of living on salmon and found guilty without trial. A bounty was offered for every lion killed, bounty hunters took to the shore with their sharp-shooting rifles, and where a convenient sandbar offered the opportunity it was often mined and the unsuspecting lions blown up after a sufficient number to make it worth while had gathered above the dynamite.

Oddly enough, it was only in Oregon that this was legalized. Neither California nor Washington permitted the killing of the sea lion and it now seems strange that were the Oregonians who promoted this business sincere they did not try to secure the enactment of bounty legislation in the two other Coast states.

This action was taken, as is generally known, by the last legislature. It had been preceded two years before by a reduction in the bounty. Now the news reports that President Hoover has reserved three reefs on the Southern Oregon coast as permanent sea lion refuges. This is very satisfactory. George W. Soranson of Port Orford has taken the lead in making the Oregon coast a safe place for the sea lion. He is to be congratulated on the success he has achieved.
