Fish and Golf Books Are Reviewed By Writer

By LANS LENEVE

There's two books just recently published that we are sure will be welcomed by two different classes and types of outdoorsmen. Reviewing them in order, first comes the "Fishermen's Digest," published by the Gun Digest Company of 4540 W. Madison St., Chicago, Ill. The second is the "Golfer's Digest."

Even veteran fishermen will find pleasant surprises in the all new 6th edition of the very informative fishermen's digest edited by Tom McNally, world renowned fisherman and writer. It covers angling in general and deals with the proper equipment to be selected while questing for various species of both large and small game fish. Myths are exploded, proven facts on the how, why and where of fishing are clearly presented. A section on rods and one on reels surveys the whole spectrum of what is available as well as new for 1966—makes comparison possible and brings into focus what is the best equipment for each man's purse and purpose. The book also contains virtually every world record of catches made. It's loaded with illustrations, lore and fact. It covers both fresh and salt water fishing—304 pages of real reading. It may be obtained at your local sports, book, department store or news dealer, or for $3.95 postpaid at the address listed above.

The other book, "The Golfer's Digest"—First Anniversary Deluxe Edition—may be obtained at the same address and for the same price as the other book.

Is Every Laborer Worthy of Hire?

By HOWARD FUJII, director, Commodities & Farm Labor

Proponents of social and minimum wage legislation say that every worker must be guaranteed a minimum hourly earning. This thinking is contrary to the adage that each person should be rewarded according to his contribution to society. Qualifications and productivity are still essential factors in determining remuneration if private enterprise is important to our society.

Mechanization has enabled many industries and certain agricultural operations to increase productivity and efficiency. Automation has eliminated the need for many machine operators. Larger and more powerful equipment has decreased agricultural manpower needs.

One of the remaining "last frontiers" requiring large numbers of hand labor is the harvest of numerous horticultural crops that have not been mechanized. As the historical "fruit tramps" disappear from the American scene, farmers have hired students, retired people and unemployed from other industries to supplement the rapidly diminishing number of professional farm workers.

Workers are paid on a piece-rate basis and individual earnings are related to productivity. Every possible worker must be employed in an attempt to save the crops, regardless of qualifications or productivity. Average piece-rate earnings generally exceed hourly agricultural wages.

The Oregon Farm Bureau and other agricultural organizations have asked the Senate labor committee to amend the Labor-passed minimum wage bill to authorize compliance if the average earnings of piece-rate workers 18-65 years of age subject to minimum wages exceed the required minimum.

Such an amendment would enable farmers to employ the relatively small percentage of the agricultural work force who cannot produce enough to justify payment of the minimum wage.

This request supplements the amendment by Rep. Edith Green exempting local seasonal piece-rate workers who commute daily from their permanent residence and work fewer than 13 weeks a year in agriculture. It would solve problems involving students housed on farms, migrant children, elderly people and handicapped workers who could not qualify for exemption because they cannot meet the requirements for commuting or for working fewer than 13 weeks.

American farmers are now facing one of the most critical labor shortages since 1942. Congress must make a choice. Even a small shortage of workers will cause crop losses that will decrease the supply and increase costs for farmers, related industries and consumers.

child, employer to employee or a guardian to an incompetent person imposes a duty to control. It is also negligence to turn a dangerous thing over to a child or to someone who cannot properly use it. Thus to give a young child a loaded gun or some poisons would be "negligence."

The same risk may apply when you leave a car with a key in the ignition near a school. In another case some road builders left the key in a bulldozer even though the builder knew that youngsters often played nearby. Persons hurt by the youngsters who moved the bulldozer could hold the vehicle owners liable.

In one extreme case a friend gave a gun to a jilted lover who had threatened to kill his ex-girl friend. When murder was committed, the killer was convicted of manslaughter. His conviction was upheld. He had set in motion a dangerous act.

Who's In Charge

Uncle Donald took his three-year-old nephew Louis for a ride to the service station. Since the station attendant was going to get his car greased right away, Donald and Louis waited around.

Louis found interesting things to do and Uncle Don had to restrain him many times. The lube job was done except for the final check which called for turning on the engine. With Louis beside him Uncle Donald started the motor. After the attendant made his check, Donald got out to look at his engine. One minute later Louis released the brake and the car rolled over the service station man's leg.

The attendant sued Don. He claimed that Don should not have left Louis alone in the car with the motor running. In reply Don said that the attendant was at fault for standing in front of the car when the engine was running with Louis in the car.

The court ruled that the jury could properly hold Don responsible. As a rule, nobody has a legal control of another's actions, but a special relation such as that of a parent to
