what's happened when the lights go out?

Most accidents aren't accidental.
They're caused. They may be caused inadvertently—but they're still caused.
When your lights go out, the chances are that one of these 5 things happened.
Right now accidents that break down electric service often interrupt vital war-production. You see, our 15,000 miles of power lines are pumping warpower to 67,000 war-jobs—scattered over an area 2,500-square-miles big. These power lines are the arteries for the lifeblood of war production.
