Ribbons of Wire...

VITAL ARTERIES OF VICTORY

NO doubt you have driven along hundreds of miles of Oregon highways, never noticing the tiny, ribbon-like wires that stretch in an endless belt from one city to another.

These copper colored, ribbon-like wires, suspended from cross arms of poles are the life blood of our war effort. For through these pathways of power flow 115,000 volts of man-made lightning—115,000 volts of war power to feed 67,000 war jobs and 20,000 war farms.

The picture shown at the right would not be very impressive unless you knew the really vital job it has already done in its short life. For instance, a vessel maneuvering in the river a short time ago snagged its anchor on the sub-marine cables from the St. Johns Sub-station, which feeds vital war plants, rolling mills, lumber mills, and blast furnaces.

The sub-marine cable was a total loss. But this new line, shown in the picture, not yet complete and coming from PGE Station E, was hurried into service so that only a very few hours of valuable war work were lost. Without this line, days, perhaps even weeks would have been required to restore warpower to these critical plants.

Once again, PGE "know-how" and experience came to the front to produce for victory. 115,000 volts of electrical energy... warpower... was at the disposal of industries producing for victory. It takes "Know-how"... "Know-how" takes experience... PGE has both.
