Northwest
POWER POOL
combats shortage with "another Bonneville"

Behind the scenes of last winter's critical power shortage 11 private and municipal power companies and the Bonneville Power Administration developed a system of cooperation which produced enough "extra" power to equal another Bonneville dam. Except for the work of the Northwest Power Pool, the electrical systems in the Northwest might have collapsed.

Here's how it works: The pool interconnects electric systems in Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Utah, Montana and British Columbia. In such a large region there are differences of time zone, weather, stream flows and other factors which produce variations both in power demand and in the output of generating plants, area to area. An area that is "short" at one time can draw upon the temporary "surplus" of another area. Later on, the situation may be completely reversed, and power will flow back the other way.

By joining resources and coordinating the operation of all generating plants in the Northwest, power pool engineers are able to utilize up to 600,000 kilowatts of power that would go to waste if the member systems were isolated! That's more power than Bonneville dam produces!

The Northwest was short of power last winter, and conditions will continue critical for several years to come. The power pool is one of the measures taken by electrical systems to meet the emergency while new dams and powerhouse are being rushed to completion.
