PGE urges early completion of Pacific Northwest POWER DAMS

You are living in the fastest growing region in the country. Oregon's population has increased almost 60% since 1941. Thousands of new homes have been built, hundreds of new industries have sprung up, expansion and modernization is to be seen everywhere. Everybody is busy "catching up" with this region's unprecedented growth.

Such growth demands electricity in abundance. Already the Pacific Northwest is the most highly electrified area in the nation, with 86 major power dams and 12 multi-purpose dams in existence. The average home and farm uses three times as much electricity as the national average.

Electricity is the lifeblood of this growing region and new supplies are needed. Government and private agencies are expending millions of dollars for Northwest power projects. Congress already has authorized 12 major dams, and many others are recommended in a carefully coordinated power, irrigation, navigation and flood control plan.

PGE believes that government has a place in the sound and economic development of our rivers. PGE, too, has a major part in the job of creating and distributing electricity, at fair prices, to the people.

And with governmental and private agencies working as a team in an atmosphere of cooperation, the development of our natural resources can be advanced at maximum speed. To that end PGE wholeheartedly supports early completion of the multi-purpose river projects authorized by Congress for the Pacific Northwest.
