LADIES FIRST!
By Terry Revenaugh

Every kitchen should have a set of household reference books. That's an arbitrary opinion, but I said it and I'm glad. No housewife goes through a day without at least six small and two large crises to cope with and sometimes a solution is needed immediately.

Now, girls whose mothers are within telephoning distance, or the experienced homemaker who knows all the answers, probably don't get too upset when junior spills ink on the new slipcovers, starch gets stuck on the electric iron or you need a super dish for unexpected guests.

But for us gals with only our God-given female ingenuity to fall back on in a pinch, it's right handy to have some authority at our fingertips to supply us with an answer or a solution.

Well, I suppose everybody has a cook book. Now to add dash to your menus and to get something really snazzy whipped up for a special occasion, try adding specialty cook books to your collection. There's a giddy one on Gay Nineties cookery; one on New England dishes. Besides making your family happy, they'll take meal-making out of the drudgery department into real adventuring.

A real boon to the crisis-filled day of the average housewife is a household encyclopedia. There, in alphabetical order, are the answers to literally thousands of questions you need answers to.

Just browsing through, for instance, there's a short item on burned food (under B of course). Tells you how to save part of the food, rescue the pan and get rid of the smell.

If junior really has spilled ink on the new slip covers, you quick whip out your household encyclopedia, turn to I, look under ink and with book in hand proceed to remedy the situation.

A first aid handbook is another thing important to have within reach. Most mothers have an imperative need of the knowledge of first aid even when a doctor's handy.

When your library begins to grow to bookshelf size you can add books on flower arrangement, interior decoration, sewing and even simple carpentry and electricity. All of them will ease your mind on the hundreds of daily questions and will add to the interest and efficiency of housekeeping.
