Stores put up signs to advertise their own business and not another's... at least that's what we thought until we saw these signs last week. One in front of the local bowling establishment points out the way to the grocery store on the next corner and the grocery store in turn has erected a sign directing the way to the kegging arena. Such friendly cooperation earns our praise and this bit of free advertising.

Pioneer Days

By LILLIAN TEN FYCK

The papers are full of it; T. V. and radio blare it; owners of summer cottages bewail it; it's a scourge of the 20th century, just plain thievery. Banks are robbed, cars are stolen, houses are broken into and contents taken and what isn't stolen is often destroyed. Nothing is safe from such vandalism.

In pioneer days honesty was pretty much the policy. The houses were never locked. A workman could leave his tools by the side of the road and come back the next day and find them just where he had left them. However Grandpa Hoffman had one experience with dishonesty, though if there is ever an excuse for dishonesty, perhaps there was one there.

There were several families who had taken up homesteads on the ridge the other side of the Little Sandy which is now in the Bull Run reserve. There was no road, only a trail from a homestead this side of the Little Sandy. So their supplies had to be carried in on horse or, lacking a horse, by their own efforts.

Several of these homesteaders worked for Grandpa Hoffman and as he was never without a good supply of staples they got much of what they needed from him. In fact, the plenty of everything Grandpa had was too big a temptation for one of them. Grain was threshed every year and it was kept in the barn in a large bin with a hinged cover. This grain was fed out during the year to a large band of hogs and also to the herd of cows.

Grandpa watched the grain pretty closely as he knew just how much should be fed out to keep the stock in good condition. One fall it seemed as though the amount of grain was going down too fast. At first he thought he imagined it, but as time went on he was sure some one was stealing it. He rather suspected that one of the Bull Run homesteaders who had worked for him might be responsible. The grain seemed to disappear at regular intervals, so when he deemed the time was about right for another haul, he got up one morning at 3 a.m., filled a sack, and sure enough found the suspected party in the grain bin busy with the grain.

Grandfather was a fair man and if the culprit had asked him for the grain or had volunteered to work for it he wouldn't have refused him, as he believed in giving everyone a fair show but he hated dishonesty. He ordered the grain stealer off the place in no uncertain terms with the added command to never set foot on the place again. In a way it seemed rather pathetic to think of old fellow walking up and down can-
