Pioneer Days

By LILLIAN TEN EYCK

A fashion editor interviewed on T. V. said that bathing suits were getting skimpier and skimpier and after seeing some of the models, I quickly decided she was so right. There were hip huggers, low slung affairs that left the viewer gasping, cut outs showing most of the rib case and various other types of wisps of cloth. The fashion expert did inject a note of hope to the viewing public. She warned that no one but teenagers and slim young career girls should indulge in such styles, as they were definitely for the little boy look. For the mature women much more sensible styles were shown. Although they would have been deemed immodest fifty years ago.

I well recall when I was teaching a summer school in Clatsop County. One weekend George came to see me and as my school wasn't far from the coast we decided to spend the day at Seaside and of course the thing to do was to take a dip in the old Pacific. We didn't have any bathing suits but that was no problem as they could be rented. A morose gentleman handed me out a one piece garment of black sateen, banded around the modest square neck with striped material which also edged the elbow length puffed sleeves. There were full bloomer with a knee length full skirt. It seemed quite daring but I was all covered with the exception of bare legs. No that would never do so I demanded some stocking. After much gumbling the storekeeper produced a pair of long black hose and some safety pins to fasten them to my bloomers. Getting dressed in the bath house, I timidily ventured forth to find George in a red wool suit cut out under the arms and a short skirt over knee length close fitting pants.

We had a kodak along and as we ventured into the waves, took turns snapping each other's pictures. In fact we used three rolls. After we were out and dressed again, George was blowing out the sand from his precious kodak when he discovered that it was set wrong so all our picture taking was to no avail. We felt quite crestfallen but then George remarked,

"After all I wouldn't have shown those pictures of you to everyone".

TANGERINES CURE SNIFFLES

Florida scientists have found that tangerines contain synephrine, heretofore produced synthetically as a stimulant and decongestant. There are lesser quantities in oranges and other citrus fruits.
