SALEM SCENE

by ERRETT CUTLER

With its legislature meeting regularly only every other year, Oregon has remained one of the last strongholds of the citizen-legislator concept of lawmaking.

Oregon citizens traditionally have been represented here by a broad cross-section of hometown professionals including lawyers and teachers, ranchers and morticians, merchants and farmers. These representatives have maintained private occupations which could be scheduled to work in their biennial lawmaking chores without inviting hardship on their families or regular jobs.

Events of recent years, however, have put the squeeze on this system. State government, becoming bigger and more complex, puts increasing demands on the time and energy of its leaders. It is tougher and tougher, especially, to look at projected state income and confidently approve all items in a growing state budget for a two-year period.

Legislative sessions often have run beyond expiration of a lawmaker's expense allowances, and we have had special sessions in 1963, 1965 and 1967. This added hazard to planning the course of one's business back home has caused many able solons to retire from public service.

Is there a better, more efficient way to run the state's business, short of electing professional politicians who rely on that as their sole occupation?

One subcommittee of the Advisory Committee on the Oregon Legislature is seeking answers to that question and will help formulate recommendations to the 1969 legislature. And annual sessions, even though they would change the complexion of our legislature, are getting the hard look. Gov. Tom McCall has recommended annual sessions, limiting them to 90 days' duration and also limiting the length of a legislator's service time in each house. State Treasurer Robert Straub recently recommended annual sessions with a 120-day limitation.

Neither would limit subject matter to be considered, as some have proposed. The Oregon Education Association, for example, testified in favor of limiting even-number-year sessions only to budget matters and keeping the time to 60 days, in order to provide an even flow in school budgeting. Many others have favored similar limitations on subject matter. This, they argue, could ease the interim load on an Emergency Board now sometimes called upon to make decisions better suited to the consideration of the entire legislature. It could encourage better organization, keeping sessions short and to the point -- and allowing citizen-legislators to plan their stays at the Capitol.

Some are advocating limited annual sessions with odd-year assemblies passing general legislation and merely reviewing budget needs. Budget legislation then could be taken up in even-numbered years, and special sessions by the governor on a strictly limited subject matter basis.

This special session question also figures in the subcommittee's deliberations. Some feel legislators ought to be able to call themselves into special session -- only the governor may do so now. Others, considering the possibilities of embarrassment to a legislative minority party or of bargaining for votes in getting such a session convened, suggest requiring a two-thirds vote instead of a simple majority.

Another school of thought has the legislature adjourning to a specific future date. This would eliminate the feeling of finality when a problem is anticipated or a question comes up for which no answer can be expected until later. Proponents say this, plus permitting the legislature to call itself into special session, could avoid annual sessions and allow brief sessions only when needed for pressing business.

Suggestions will be presented to the overall committee on June 3. At its meeting this month the sub-group decided to recommend:

--Annual legislative sessions, without limitations on length or subject matter. Some members, however, reserved the right to support an alternative plan allowing the legislature to adjourn until a specific time. (This alternative raises a Constitutional question, as most laws now become effective 90 days after "final" adjournment.)

--That the legislature should be Constitutionally allowed to call itself into special session by a majority vote of both houses. Reservations again were expressed, however, by subcommittee members who would prefer a greater majority requirement.

Outcome of such recommendations undoubtedly will be affected by those of other subcommittees of the Advisory Committee on the Oregon Legislature, notably the subcommittee on legislative organization.

Changing committees to retain regular session members on interim committees, for example, could alter arguments for annual session needs somewhat. So could formation of a Joint Taxation Committee, expanded Ways and Means activities or increased membership and authority for the Emergency Board.

Whatever the immediate outcome, Oregon voters will make the final decisions on annual sessions and on the mechanics of any change, because our present system is locked into the Constitution. Comparison of Oregon with other states, many of which practice systems involving annual sessions and frequent special sessions, will indicate how really significant these decisions can be.
