This wildlife column is generally occupied with various wildlife or Game Commission activities, but since a rash of fawnnapping has occurred and is occurring all over Oregon, we present a guest article by Clarence Beezley of the Texas Parks and Wildlife Department.

Beezley tells the story of the "Bambi myth" much better than I and with it perhaps we might prevent a number of Oregonians from getting into deep, deep trouble.

FAWNAPPING ILLEGAL
We don't know why, but even with repeated warnings that fawnnapping is illegal and citations will be issued to persons violating the law, thoughtless individuals continue to take these tiny creatures home. The following story is not only for fawnnappers, but for all other persons who believe that little Bambi is something sacred.

"A wild Bambi never did, doesn't and never will exist. Unfortunately, a fawn deer looks just like a Bambi. But a fawn deer is wild and you cannot make of a wild thing something that was created with a cartoonist's pencil and a photographer's camera. But people keep trying — several hundred times a year.

"They will find it just lying there, no larger than a Twiggy-legged housecat, all curled up like a caterpillar, a bundle in the grass, with smooth tawny skin flecked with small spots of frozen sunshine. There will be just enough black for highlights — a line down the back, around a tiny muzzle, and a shadow around the eyes.

"Large in proportion to the head, the eyes will be set below a pair of long soft, slightly floppy ears. The eyes will do it — slightly almond-shaped with long lashes, they will be soft and innocent and dark, yet so limpid that one can almost see a pure soul reflected in the depths. The fawn will have a beauty that will put a lump in the throat and someone is sure to say, 'Oh! It looks just like Bambi!'

"The beauty is a flaw. It

Thurs., July 6, 1972 (Sec. 1) SANDY (Ore.) POST — 5 would be better for deer and people if fawns looked more like wart hogs. Then they wouldn't be taken home.

"Fawnnapping is a violation of both provincial and natural laws. But a fawn is beautiful and this makes it easy to rationalize the crime. 'It looks so thin and alone,' or, 'The mother is probably dead,' or, 'We had better take it home and save its life.' They do, and when they do, they might as well kill it.

"They usually name the new pet Bambi. It will follow the children and suckle their fingers. It will drink milk from a bottle and soon learn to drink from a pan. It will romp about like a little lamb on its dainty, razor sharp little hooves. An affection-giving child may pick up Bambi, the fawn may lash out with its razor hooves, and there will be some nasty gashes.

"But after all, the child should have known better! Bambi was frightened."

MORTALITY HIGH
"A good many Bambi's die within the first three months. One minute it will be all right and suddenly it will have dysentery. Within a few hours it will be dead because baby deer needs its mother's milk. Bambi will have a suitable burial and for a long time there will be sad memories about the lovable pet that suddenly died.
