Army seeks non-high school grads again

Army recruiters can start pursuing the non-high school graduate again after a period of restricting enlistments in that category in order to build a higher quality All-Volunteer Army.

But the 17 year old non-high school graduate will still be discouraged from joining up because the Army still does not want the young high school "dropout." In fact, he will be encouraged by the recruiter to stay in school at all costs and finish his education. However, after the prospect graduates or turns 18, the recruiter is free to enlist him.

Selectivity had become a necessity to maintain the Army's health. A few months ago, the Army Recruiting Command put a 70-30 ratio on the number of high school grads versus non-graduates so that 70 per cent of the young people enlisting per month had to have a high school diploma in hand. GED (General Education Development) scores did not qualify an individual for this group unless state issued. The Intent upon being a comprehensive college, Mt. Hood Community College affords its students the opportunity of competing athletically.

Athletics is as much a factor in an individual's growth as is classroom instruction. Numerous programs are offered each year to involve students with the physically competitive aspect of college life.

College teams in football, basketball, basketball, cross country, skiing and track draw the student who has the time and energy to devote to strenuous training.

Inter-collegiate sports programs at the community college level provide a person who accepts the challenge with a training ground from which he may move on to four-year university play if he desires. Ore, the competition can be but an extension of high school and the terminating point of one's athletic career.

Intramural sports at MHCC do not demand the total commitment that the college sports require. Thus, the student who wishes to continue athletic activity, but on a smaller scale, may.

Both intramural and college sports programs provide each potential athlete or interested student with an outlet for activity other than instructional. The class games afford an opportunity to compete and initiate spirit and companionship.

Expanding an individual's knowledge is the primary function of a community college such as Mt. Hood, but the necessity for physical as well as mental competitiveness is the right arm of growth.

remaining 30 per cent consists of those who achieved a high grade on the Armed Forces Qualification Test. Those who couldn't pass stood little or no chance of ever being able to enter the Army. But now that has changed.

In order for the All-Volunteer Army to make it, a change in policy had to be made. While the Army was satisfied with the high caliber individual that was joining, there just weren't enough of them to fill the manpower requirements needed. So it was the recruiter who was hurting by not being able to sign up a lot of willing prospects just because they didn't finish high school.

Does this mean that quality is going to go down now? Not so, according to Lieutenant Colonel James J. Brenner, Commanding Officer for Army Recruiting in the state of Oregon. "Our mental category standards are still going to remain high, but there's little logic to assume that just because a man doesn't have a high school diploma means that he's a low mentality individual. That just isn't true."

The Army, as well as the other services, has found that many of its best soldiers never graduated from high school. They have skills that can be put to good use in technological areas where a high school diploma is not the only answer. Many of these people then become motivated enough to want to go back to school and finish their education while in the Army and even pursue technically oriented studies for college credit later on.

While the past few months have provided the Army with a more educated breed of recruits than ever before, it also made them realize that if the All-Volunteer Army is to become a reality it must be willing to gamble on the young individual who for one reason or another was not motivated in school. The Army also realizes its responsibility when it enlists the non-high school graduate. It must try and provide this individual with a skill that will not only make him productive to the Army but will provide him with the incentive to want to continue his education.

If the Army realizes its responsibility in that way then those in the community who question their motives might take a second look.

Cottrell "Cougar" news

FIRST GRADE NEWS
Twenty-four eager boys and girls have been enrolled in the first grade. We use the word eager as that seems to describe them so well.

The first graders are good listeners so will learn many new things.

We are stressing "safety rules" on the playground and bus, as well as in the classroom.

We have been in school such a short time, but are working hard on reading readiness, writing and math. We are looking forward to reading many books and we will love to read our Weekly Readers.

SECOND GRADE NEWS
Cottrell's second grade has 29 students enrolled, with 5 children new to our school this year.

We have shared summer adventures and are now swinging into new school activities. Our new social studies program promises exciting projects and many opportunities for creative young writers and artists. John Thomas and his mother have already surprised us with a treat in honor of his birthday and we had fun ordering "extra milk" at lunch time for Lisa Krogh's kitten who came to visit school on Monday.

THIRD GRADE NEWS
Cottrell's third grade class began the year by getting to work. They have taken placement tests and started doing their three R's with vigor and enthusiasm. Students interviewed about school say, "I like it", or "It's fine", and "It's fun", also, "We'll-I-I!"

The third grade class has already begun lessons in creative writing and they may write a classroom book before Halloween creeps around.

We third graders are learning about direction. Can you tell which direction is North? We have even made a floor plan map of our school.
