Boring students know weather

If you want to know if it's going to rain or snow, what the wind velocity may be, or how much the humidity is these days, you should attend Robert Lundborg's science class at the Boring Grade School.

An actual weather station hangs from the ceiling in Lundborg's interesting, spacious classroom.

Enterprising students at the school helped pay half of the weather station's installation cost by staging candy sales and similar money raising projects.

Lundborg's enthusiastic students have found that there's more to meteorology than peeping at clouds or poking a thumb up in the air.

Their newly acquired labor of love is a daily ritual. Temperature, wind velocity, humidity and all aspects of reading and recording changing weather conditions are scientifically measured by the students. This data is then replayed on charts and graphs in the classroom and posted in the school's main hall for all to see.

Most involved in the weather recording project, an all year undertaking, are seventh graders Deana Rursel, Heidi Lorensten, Kathy VanBeek, and eighth grader David Trichler.

Trying something different at their meeting last week was Sandy fourth grade Adventure group. Their leader had prepared four short plays and the girls paired off to practice these plays and gather props they would use. After everyone was finished they all enjoyed listening to the recording of their voices. Before adjourning the meeting the girls were served popcorn and Kool-Aid.

Members of this group are Wendy Barstad, Mindy Congdon, Jennifer Mann, Kristie Markwell, Pebbles Moore, Tracie Ruple, Tammy Stalvig, Laura Stringham, Mrs. Sandra Congdon, leader, and Mrs. Leal Markwell, assistant leader.

A new third grade Blue Bird group was formed in Sandy recently with Mrs. Leonor Sattui as leader and Mrs. Darla DuBois, assistant leader. Girls meeting twice a month at their leaders home are Elizabeth Ash, Regina Astleford, Norma Brown, Brenda DuBois, Carrie Leith, Tana Nonamaker, Nicole Nunes, and Christine Sattui.
