Filmmaker creates educating experience for self, others

by Mike Finnegan

Documentary filmmaker Ofra Bikel discovered a unique way to educate herself about the South American democracy of Colombia: she made a film about it. That film, entitled 'Bogota, One Day,' provided a fascinating look at the various classes of people that inhabit that city and proved to be quite an educating 90 minutes when it was shown on the critically-acclaimed PBS series 'World' last month.

"I knew nothing about it," she cordially admitted in a recent publicity interview in New York. "My assignment was to cover some aspect of life in South America. I took a chance and loved the people of Colombia. I found them incredibly charming and polite."

What the award-winning director, who has nearly 20 years worth of credits in American, British and Israeli television, found was a land of sharp contrasts despite its democratic system and dispassionate as it was, the film nonetheless created a great sympathy for the lower class residents profited, especially the gamines, homeless children who live a daily hand-to-mouth existence.

"They were so happy that someone noticed and paid attention to them," Miss Bikel said. "Colombia seems like the most orphaned nation. Much of it is so untouched and beautiful and nobody makes anything of it. There are no villains there that anyone can put the finger on, it's just that nobody cares." For balance, the film also looked at the activities of a nouveau riche businessman and a government administrator who deals with rural farmers. But the heart of the film lies in the inner-city images of several families living in various rooms of once-great mansions and struggling to get along. "Millions in Bogota make only as much as (the equivalent of) 75 cents a day," Miss Bikel said. When the family is large, the hardships multiply.

The big money is in contraband and Miss Bikel and her crew got a lesson on how the money changes hands and captured it on film. Her cameras
