Education helps employees keep pace

Business, industry and the public sector are all giving increased priority and financial encouragement to employees who seek professional growth through year-round continuing education, according to Dr. Kent J. Collings, Dean of the University of Portland's School of Business Administration.

As a result, he foresees that by the mid-1980s, 60 percent of higher education will be concerned with the upward mobility goals of adult students. He feels that this growing acceptance of the concept of life-long continuing education has come about because managers now realize the real need that exists for keeping employees abreast of changing technology and current thinking, if individual companies are to remain competitive in the marketplace.

Collings, an authority in the field of industrial relations who is in frequent demand as an arbitrator, fact finder and as a specialist in motivation and aging problems, points out that for at least a decade the University of Portland has been actively providing working adult students credit and non-credit courses taught outside normal classroom hours and frequently scheduled for centralized off-campus sites.

Collings feels strongly that the metropolitan Portland business, industrial community is fortunate in having close by access to a private university that can readily respond to the need for the teaching of highly specialized professional subject matter. He takes pride in the quality of the pool of faculty talent that his school makes available adult-oriented programs.

Again this fall, the university is offering various seminars and workshops at the professional level.

Among them: a 10-class review in preparation for an examination leading to a certificate in management executives; three evenings on Decision Making; two Accounting for non-financial accounting; a three-evening Management by Objectives workshop; a three-evening Management Information Systems workshop; a six-session Labor-Management seminar.

Complete details on all offerings are available directly from the seminar coordinator at the School of Business Administration, University of Portland, 97203.

National forests in northwest yield large crop of conifer seeds

Forests in Oregon and Washington this year are expected to produce the best seed crop in seven years, according to the U.S. Forest Service.

Cones collected from more than 30,000 trees in national forests in the two states will yield an estimated 70,000 pounds of seed.

R.E. Worthington, regional forester, said this year's crop comes at a time when the supply of nursery seed is critically low. The last good seed crop was in 1971.

"To illustrate how critical a good seed crop is in our reforestation efforts, if we hadn't made as good a collection as we did in 1971, we wouldn't be able to meet our reforestation efforts today," Worthington said. "We would have been out of seedlings to plant."

A total of $3.5 million has been allocated to harvest the cones. They will be collected by forest service employees and by individuals under contract to the agency.

Worthington said spring frost and insects did considerable damage to this year's crop, which had the potential to be one of the best crops in the history of the service.

Nearly two dozen species of conifers are involved in the seed harvesting. However, emphasis is placed on Douglas fir, true fir, larch, and ponderosa and lodgepole pine.

Seed cone harvesting usually takes place from late August to mid-November. This year's crop is expected to complete ripening about two weeks early.

All seed used by the forest service is certified by the Seed Certification Service at Oregon State University or by the Washington State Crop Improvement Association Inc. Seedlings produced from the seed also are certified.

By certifying seeds and seedlings, Worthington said the forest service is able to keep track of what seed came from what location.

"Seedlings are returned to the areas where the seed was harvested, providing the best possible means of assuring success in reforestation efforts," he said.

OMSI annual meeting to feature solar eclipse

Election of trustees and a special show on "Solar Eclipse, '79," will be featured at the annual membership meeting of Oregon Museum of Science and Industry at 7:30 p.m. Wednesday, Sept. 28, in OMSI's Main Auditorium. Following the business meeting, a special slide-tape show will be presented by the staff of the Harry C. Kendall planetarium on the total solar eclipse that will take place over Portland the morning of Feb. 26 next year.

This is the first total solar eclipse to be visible over Oregon since 1918. The next total solar eclipse over the state will not occur until 2068. The program will explain why an eclipse occurs, tell how best to view it and what to expect next February when the earth goes dark shortly after the sun rises.

OMSI also announced it has been awarded a grant of $25,000 from the Institute of Museum Services to help cover additional expenses incurred in planning a major expansion of OMSI's physical facilities.

Some of the additional expenses arising from OMSI's plans for expansion have been a feasibility study by the staff and board of trustees, a site study by geologists and engineers and preliminary planning by an architect to determine needs and costs.

Women to fellowship

Sharon Peters, a wife, mother and past president of Oregon Women's Aglow will be the featured speaker at Evening Joy Fellowship Monday, Sept. 25.

Free babysitting will be available for pre-schoolers.

The Joy Fellowship will be held at Mt. Hood Christian Center, Highway 26 at Hillyard Rd., one mile southeast of Gresham.

Women with an interest in Joy Fellowship are invited to the meeting. A back-to-school fashion show, door prizes, dessert and coffee will be featured as well as music.

Doors open at 6 p.m. and the meeting will get under way at 7. Tickets are 75 cents in advance and $1 at the door.
