Swans find home in Oregon wilds

Cygnets hatch in late June and are soon led to water where they begin to feed and grow under the midnight sun. Both adults assist in rearing the young.

During this period the adults molt all their flight feathers and for a time the entire family is flightless. By late September or early October the southward migration begins, a trip for some that will exceed 2,000 miles.

Some veer toward the east and winter along the Atlantic coast. Others winter along the Pacific coast of Canada and in the western coastal states. Oregon's largest numbers were recorded in Lane County, 1,023 and Lake County, 920.

Trumpeter swans were once common over much of Oregon. Lewis and Clark reported the first sightings of both trumpeter and whistling swans near the mouth of the Columbia in January of 1806. They remained fairly common through the late 1800's but apparently suffered a rapid decline near the turn of the century.

Populations of both species of swans reached low numbers early in this century. Their large size, conspicuous color, and trusting nature, plus a lack of legal protection led to unrestricted killing over much of their range. They were also commercially valuable and many skins were sold on the market for feathers, down and quills, which made high-quality writing pens.

The Migratory Bird Treaty Act of 1918 was the tool which led to a turn-about in swan numbers. That protection combined with the relative stability of the whistling swan's arctic nesting grounds enabled that species to quickly begin rebuilding its numbers. The population of this species is now estimated at about 100,000 and it is considered common in many areas where it formerly was abundant.

But in 1929 it was considered extremely rare to see a trumpeter in Oregon. In 1933 the population in the lower states was estimated at only 66 birds. But they, too, have shown an encouraging recovery. Strict federal protection combined with the transplant of birds to areas where they formerly existed have been the keys. The population in the lower states is now estimated at 1,500 birds. More than 4,000 trumpeters are found in Alaska. That group winters along the Pacific coast from Alaska south to the Columbia River.

During the period 1939 to 1958 some 120 trumpeter swans were transplanted from Red Rock Lake, Montana, to Malheur National Refuge. The first successful broods were produced in 1958 and the refuge now supports a fairly stable population of from 35 to 40 birds. More birds have been produced than the static population would indicate, and refuge manager Joe Mazoni thinks some of the birds migrate to other areas although he doesn't yet know where.

Last year three trumpeter swans wearing colored neck collars wintered on the Crooked River near Prineville. Numbers on the collars indicated the birds had come from Turnbull National Wildlife Refuge near Spokane, Wash. where freeze-up had driven them out.

A third swan sometimes seen in Oregon is the mute swan. It is the semi-domesticated bird of parks, zoos and private estates. It is easily distinguished from our wild swans by its bill which is orange except for a black base. There is also a fleshy knob on the forehead not seen in other swans. On the water the mute swan carries its neck in a graceful "s" with bill pointed downward. Occasionally this species will be seen on one of Oregon's rivers or lakes, but usually in close association with human habitation.
