During past year

Property tax levies took jump

1980-81 property tax levies took what may be the biggest jump in Oregon history, rising 17.4 percent over 1979-80 to nearly $1.2 billion, according to a state wide summary prepared by Oregon Tax Research, the Salem-based taxpayer research association.

This year's rate of growth is more than double the 8.5 percent annual average of the last 10 years. Overall, Oregon property tax levies have risen 163 percent since 1970, 74 percent since 1975.

Levies for schools and education service districts hit $743 million — 62 percent of the statewide total — up nearly 17 percent from the $636 million posted in 1979-80. City levies — 15.5 percent of the total $1.2 billion — rose a whopping 21 percent to $184 million.

"A decline in the growth of state aid to local school districts and the effects of inflation on the costs to local governments were certainly big factors in this year's significant levy growth," said John Marshall, OTR fiscal analyst responsible for the summary.

"But you also have to remember that during 1980, local voters approved a good portion of these higher levy amounts. I'm sure the 1979 property tax relief plan providing for state payment of up to 30 percent of homeowner tax bills gave added incentive for voter approval of hefty levy increases," Marshall said.

Backyard burning ban hearing set next week

The backyard burning ban, which was to have gone into effect this year, may end up being only a partial ban for the Sandy-Boring area and no ban at all for the Hoodland Fire District.

An Environmental Quality Commission meeting at which commission members will hear comment on recommended changes in the backyard burning ban will be held next Friday, Jan. 30, at 8 a.m.

The hearing on the commission's agenda will be for public comment on proposals by the Department of Environmental Quality to change the boundaries in which the commission banned backyard burning effective the start of this year.

Instead of a complete ban on burning throughout the area, explained Tom Bispham of the DEQ staff, the changes would allow year-round burning in some areas, allow twice-a-week burning in other areas and continue the ban in the more populated areas of the county.

Burning would be allowed twice a week in the Boring and Sandy fire districts. Year-round burning would be allowed in the Hoodland and Estacada areas and the Clackamas County portion of the Clackamas-Marion Fire Protection District.
