

'Tis the season for magical puckas to visit

Jimmy Stewart was plagued by a large white rabbit in a movie by the name of "Harvey." This monstrous bunny was a pukka, a superior spirit which advocates good works and is visible only to Mr. Stewart.

Unable to perform good deeds themselves, the pukka had to depend on a mortal to carry out its wishes, putting Mr. Stewart's movie character into considerable hot water.

All white rabbits are not puckas and all puckas are not necessarily white rabbits, but the rabbit image seems to be most popular among puckas. When you think about it, every good magician has had his own pukka — some were doves, but most were rabbits the magician pulled from his hat.

The grand pukka of them all has to be the Easter Bunny.

Children have various ideas on just what the Easter Bunny looks like. Some envision him as a combination rabbit and kangaroo, for the added jumping power and the pocket to put baskets in.

Others think he has very long arms and looks like a lovable, long-eared Sasquatch. His height averages between four and six feet; anything over 6-feet tall would be too scary and anything under 4-feet would be too weak.

Bits and pieces

The Easter Bunny has long ears that act like radar, enabling him to detect exactly where the good children are living. His eyes are brown, not red, and filled with love. Anything 6-feet tall with red eyes would look like the devil.

Apparently the reason the bunny's nose twitches is to tell him when the candy is the right temperature to mold. The most important part of this magical pukka, however, is his tail. Children say his tail is shaped like a powder puff to dust his tracks away.

Little thought is given to where he lives during the greater part of the year or how he manages to round up so many eggs. One pre-school theory is that the elves from the North Pole are on spring vacation around Easter and since they paint toys for Santa, they probably paint the eggs for Peter.

Another popular explanation is that if brown chickens lay brown eggs and white chickens lay white eggs, then the chickens that lay Easter eggs must be rainbow-colored.

A great deal of importance is placed on one's personal appearance at the spring holiday. Easter parades, fashion shows, the trip to church and the family dinner have all become places to show off spring attire. The general public becomes on gigantic butterfly, emerging from its cocoon of winter drabness.

So much emphasis is put on dress that children who generally care less how the look want to become part of the festivities, at least, for a little while. Soon the stiff skirt starts to itch and the leotards start to dig into the soft tummies. The bow ties begin to choke and the suit jacket gets too hot.

Children worry more about the appearance of the Easter Bunny than themselves. They can come up with some puzzling questions.

How can he handle all those chocolate rabbits and stay so white? Why don't jelly beans stick to his hair? How can he travel so far and not get mud or dirt on his feet? If he breaks an egg, does he give it to somebody that wasn't nice? How come he doesn't shed like all the other animals do in the spring? Is the Easter Bunny housebroken?

Well, some questions never get answered.

Neither rain, no snow, nor sleet nor shine can keep him from his appointed rounds. The Easter Bunny is on his way today.
