Bill Nickleberry and Max Pittman practice what we preach...conservation. And save PGE customers about $110,000 a year.

This year, Bill, Willamette Center building Manager, and Max, the Center's Superintendent, along with the rest of the PGE Watt Watching staff will help save about $110,000 through conservation measures being practiced at the Willamette Center building complex, PGE's headquarters.

Bill and his co-workers are putting to use many of the conservation techniques we've been advising customers about for more than eight years. The conservation techniques in use include thermopane glass windows, insulation and weather-stripping. Since the Center was first occupied, the air in the building has been heated mainly by body heat, office machine heat and the heat from overhead lights.

As a result of their efforts and by making more efficient use of construction pre-planning, Bill, Max and fellow employees and tenants have been able to reduce the energy use at the Willamette Center by 12 per cent, or almost 3 million kilowatt-hours. At today's rates, that's a savings of almost $110,000 a year. Savings that are more important now than ever before.

Electricity costs are going up everywhere, it's not just here. Both private and public utilities throughout the country are facing soaring costs. Higher equipment costs, fuel costs and interest rates have everyone on a tight budget. And the rapid increase of new residential and business customers in the region is another strain on existing supply.

But, at PGE, we are fortunate to have people like Bill and Max working hard to keep costs down for customers wherever they can. People who care.

People with cost-saving ideas for you.
