Keep Well clinics revived

The Keep Well Clinic, a preventative health program for Clackamas County senior citizens, will remain in good health at least until the end of September. At that time, a proposed senior services levy may begin paying for the service.

County Commissioner Ralph Groener opposed a proposed cut of the program at last Thursday's meeting of the county commission. The Area Agency on Aging had proposed the cut because of a reduction in the county general fund support.

The elimination was proposed when it was learned the county intended to discontinue the AAA's $60,000 request as the county's share of AAA programs, according to Jono Hildner, administrator of the county's Department of Human Resources.

AAA would not have been able to operate the Keep Well Clinics as a full program. Most of the program's other funds come from the Federal Older Americans Act.

The clinics involve health screening for senior citizens by health division nurses. There is also a home-visit program which tries to prevent health problems. Nurses check patients for potential problems, then refer the seniors to physicians for treatment.

Groener said he would not support the 1982 AAA program if it did not include the clinics.

Thus, a compromise was reached which will keep the clinics operating at least until September, pending budget committee approval.

That agreement, according to Hildner, is that all AAA social services will be cut by 4 percent, freeing $4,000 for the Keep Well Clinics. That, with $18,000 in county general fund money, will be enough for the clinics through Sept. 30. A full program costs approximately $100,000, Hildner said.

County commissioners plan to place a three-year senior services levy, to raise as much as $6 million, on the Sept. 15 ballot.
