Computer courses popular at Firwood School, MHCC

by SCOTT NEWTON

The personal touch still counts in education.

Kari Jo Rohr, a fifth grade instructor at Firwood School, took it upon herself, with the permission of the principal, to put her own computer in the classroom two years ago.

This summer she and her husband, John, ran a computer-sports camp at Mt. Hood Community College that was so popular there are parents who are already trying to get their children registered in the camp for next summer.

Rohr has also taught classes in computers for educators at the college.

She has done "outstanding" work at MHCC, said Mike Stevenson, director of computer services.

The emphasis at Firwood School is on the computer, not classroom instruction using the computer. "To do that you'd need classrooms full of computers," Kari Jo Rohr said.

The computer is a tool of the future, and the young people are our future, Rohr said.

Two years ago only the students in Rohr's fifth grade class used computers, but last year all students at Firwood had the opportunity.

The school's first computer was purchased a year ago by the Parent-Teacher Club with money raised through the Firwood carnival.

The teachers were behind the (idea of buying) computers," said Linda Whitmore, Firwood librarian. "There were some other options.

"Even with their not knowing anything about it, and being reticent to doing it themselves, they still felt it was an important step to take."

Rohr agreed. Despite the proliferation of computers many educators are reluctant to incorporate their use,
