A glance away from Mt. Hood the grave of an unknown pioneer woman lies unmarked beside the historic Barlow Trail.

Unmarked until just recently, that is.

Here, beginning at the western terminus of the Oregon Trail, where it merges into the dominance of Mt. Hood's southern shoulder, are 80 miles of a rugged and crude roadway that became the "gateway" to the Willamette Valley. It was carved out of an ancient Indian trail by Kentucky-born Samuel Kimbrough Barlow.

Close to 80 years later, in the 1920s, a state highway construction crew, building the original Mt. Hood Loop Highway, discovered the remains of what looked like a grave. Exploring further, it was discovered the rotting wood that surrounded the bones was the remnants of a wagon box.

Sue Marvin, cultural resource specialist for the U.S. Forest Service supervisor's office for the Mt.

Hood National Forest, said the crew reburied her, moving her out of the path of the new road.

Conformation of today's site as being the exact location of the pioneer woman's grave, said Marvin, has yet to be done. As of yet, no one has conducted a search of the highway division's records to verify this is actually where her remains were buried.
