Medical Center names Boring man president

A Boring man, Larry D. Dodds, has been appointed the new president of Portland Adventist Medical Center, succeeding Donald R. Ammon, also of Boring.

Dodds, who fills the new position Feb. 16, has served as the medical center's senior vice president since 1980, when he returned to Portland after spending a year as the associate administrator of Walla Walla General Hospital in Washington.

Prior to that, he was a vice president of Portland Adventist Medical Center and vice president of the VertiCare health program in Portland.

Before moving to Portland in 1973, Dodds was the director of finance for Leland Memorial Hospital in Riverdale, Md.

He received his master's degree in business administration from Portland State University in 1978. He also graduated in 1970 from Union College, Lincoln, Neb., with a bachelor's degree in business.

Ammon is leaving to serve as executive vice president of the hospital's parent corporation, Adventist Health System-West, in Roseville, Calif.
