Secret Weapon

Citizens fear predatory grand jury investigations.

There's one really important thing Jennifer Woodruff wants a reporter to know: "I know nothing about the fire."

The fire in question was in the spring of 2001, the second arson at a Romania car dealership in Eugene, lit by someone ostensibly intending to support activists Jeffrey "Free" Luers and Craig "Critter" Marshall as they were prosecuted for torching Romania vehicles two years earlier.

ing her housing and her job.

Grand juries meet in secret to gather evidence in support of officially indicting someone for a crime. The secrecy is intended to protect both witnesses and those erroneously thought to be involved with the crime.

But grand juries also have been used throughout their history as a secretive, threatening weapon against activists — on causes ranging from peace and independence to the environmental and animal rights movements.

AND THEN THEY NUDGE YOU AND SEE HOW YOU REACT.
THEN THEY RETREAT, AND THEN THEY COME IN FOR THE

KILL!

— JENNIFER WOODRUFF

Knowing nothing about the fire is important to Woodruff — a single mother living in the Whiteaker with her 9-and-a-half-year-old son — because any week now she expects a grand jury to force her to answer questions about it. More to the point, the grand jury can also compel her to disclose any details it wants about her law-abiding friends in a secret proceeding, without her lawyer present. If she refuses, she could face half a year in jail, separated from her son, potentially los-

Activists subpoenaed to appear before the juries find themselves faced with the choice of relinquishing their right to privacy and free political association or months of jail time for contempt of court.

"We're living in a time period when big brother is attempting to get stronger and stronger, and will cloak itself in as much legitimacy as it can," say Lauren Regan, local attorney and executive director of the Eugene-based Civil Liberties Defense
