JILL'S DRUMMING woke Peter up six times the night before his interview. He'd been reaching for escape from his dead end office job for seven years. That was some 2,000 mornings of wearing a tie and drinking weak coffee while his mindless co-workers chatted about their lame weekend plans. Over those seven years, he'd brought an assortment of weapons to the office more times than he cares to count. The interview, then, had the promise of release. If it weren't for his new neighbor's comely way of retying her shoes while failing, in a cute way, to keep her hair out of her eyes, he'd have reported Jill to the police. Instead, he lay in his bed, trying to work up the courage to walk down the hall and ask her nicely to stop. Three times he even sat up and once got as far as putting his feet in his slippers, but each time, panic set in and he lay down again. He worried over his bed head, his midnight death breath, and most of all, his too tight pajama bottoms. So he failed, yet again, because of an imagined love.
