fish. The other fish smell the "predation cue" and try to avoid being eaten too.

The study focused on juvenile Coho salmon, but the scientists say the results apply to fish species worldwide.

Studies show higher levels of copper contamination in streams close to roads and highways. Other sources of contamination in California and the Pacific Northwest include certain pesticide formulations and building materials.

The levels of copper used in the study were at or below current federal guidelines for heavy metals. The results raise the question of whether current water quality standards are adequate, according to Jeff Jenkins, an OSU environmental toxicologist.

"It's just like they were poisoned," he said. — Camilla Mortensen
