
forests on public lands to appease Oregon's big timber. This is a little better than the BLM current attempts to destroy nearly one million acres of old-growth forests.

We have more science than ever pointing to the fact that if we don't immediately save collapsing ecosystems and zero our carbon footprint that we are doomed as a civilization and maybe as a species.

It's time to play political hardball with big timber, politicians, corporations, the BLM and Forest Service because all life including human life is depending on us reversing our course as a civilization.

The reality is, the people will lead and the politicians will follow. Failure is extinction.

SPOILER ALERT!

I wish to comment about the horrible movie reviews in your publication written by Jason Blair. In his Sept 13 review of 3:10 to Yuma, he commits the cardinal sin of reviewers by giving away too much of the plot. Fortunately, I have been seeing movies prior to reading Jason's reviews. But if I had not, I would have known that the members of the posse die during the trip, until the farmer and his son are left to face the final challenge alone.

Knowing that would have totally ruined the experience of watching this film. Jason gives away far too much information about how the movie ends, too. This is another rule that no reviewer should ever violate.

Even worse is his Sept. 20 review of Jodie Foster's The Brave One, in that, besides these faults, he also makes factually false statements about the film. He attempts to portray the film as being racist (when it clearly isn't), and states, "all the victims are black or Hispanic," which is not true. The very first wife murderer Foster kills, the man who kidnaps and tortures a prostitute, and the illegal arms dealer who also killed his wife are all clearly Caucasian.

Either Mr. Blair is incompetent or he has such a personal bias against this film that he has actually stooped to lying about it in order to badmouth it.

Whichever it is, he certainly does not deserve to write for your publication.
