Entering a tattoo parlor can summon those anxious adolescent insecurities that arose whenever you arrived at a new environment that was cooler and edgier than any place you'd been to before. The butterflies are already intensely flapping during the permanent placement of your first tattoo, and the demand for a friend in need can be so high that not even the sweet sorrows of James Taylor and Carole King can caress. It's these nervous feelings that fuel and propel Jimmy Singleton of The Parlour Tattoo. "He's overly nice and really goes that extra mile for his clients," says Kristian Wilson, Singleton's schedule manager and co-worker. "He makes people feel safe and turns clients into friends and makes them want to come back."
