The quintessential image of Americana, singer-songwriter Joe Pug (born Joseph Pugliese) fingerpicks his guitar while a harmonica hangs from his neck, a disarming rasp twinging his voice. Thanks to this look, he's often likened to folk prophets like Bob Dylan and John Prine — though the contents of his songwriting aren't too far off, either. Carrying on the tradition of literate, landscape-driven imagery and tangible melody in American songwriting, Pug is the one-man folk show adapted for modern times: Just swap the social justice references with tales of personal heartbreak and wrongdoing. As a descendant of the greats who came before, Pug fills a much-needed space in con-temporary acoustic music. To prove his "folkness," he even sends free CDs to anyone interested, and often offers them up at his shows — so there's no excuse not to fall in love with him.

Joe Pug opens for The Devil Makes Three 8:30 pm Thursday, Feb. 5, at the McDonald Theatre; $25, all ages.
