

Whether you feel nervous about natural disasters or avoid thinking about them entirely, you'll certainly find value in Lucy Jones, Ph.D.'s lecture on natural disasters and community resilience. Jones is a longtime researcher and founder of a new nonprofit, the Dr. Lucy Jones Center for Science and Society, which focuses on filling in the communication gap between scientists and decision-makers. "I'm looking to integrate all our different understandings of disasters to better help people understand what it means when they hear 'you're going to have an earthquake in the future,'" Jones (pictured) says. Her talk will go over several examples of natural disasters and how people responded to them, and what that says about human psychology. She says, "This is going to be looking at how the evolution of human cognitive processes affects how we think about natural disasters," in particular the human inclination to ignore long-term, distant threats and our aversion to randomness. Jones points out that the most common way of preparing for a disaster is individually, but she says, "those are not going to be the communities that survive. Communities that have a lot of social capital, the ones that have a lot of connections, tend to be the ones that do better."

Lucy Jones will give her lecture, "The Fault Lies Not in Our Stars: Why Natural Disasters Become Human Catastrophes" 7:30 pm Thursday, March 9, in 156 Straub Hall on the UO campus. — Kelly Kenoyer
