Tired of Trump's talk of building walls? Here's a chance to see how graffiti on walls is raising awareness about Baha'i persecution by the Iranian government. Changing the World, One Wall at a Time is produced by Iranian-Canadian journalist Maziar Bahari, and shows how artists and human rights activists have teamed up to use art and community outreach to spread a message of education equality in Iran. The documentary features interviews with popular artists and activists involved with historical civil rights movements in the US, South Africa, and Iran, as well as Baha'is who have been denied access to higher education. "We fought brutality with arts and creativity," Bahari said in a statement. "The fact that we brought together so many artists — who did not know anything about the persecution of the Baha'is in Iran, and who then created amazing works of art all around the world — shows there is a willingness among people many different backgrounds to join such a struggle." It's all a part of a worldwide campaign called Education Is Not a Crime. Called the world's largest street art and human rights campaign, it aims to combat the current Iranian government education policy that has kept tens of thousands of Baha'is in the country from teaching and studying at Iranian universities. In fact, 41 murals have been painted in the U.S. and cities across the world.

Changing the World, One Wall at a Time is 2 pm Saturday, April 14, at the Jordan Schnitzer Museum of Art on the University of Oregon campus. The event is open to all and FREE. — Henry Houston
