This "First" Home Has Value Later

Easy to build and "gives lots for your money"—that is the reason many farmers in Oregon's newly-irrigated sections are putting up combination house-machine sheds such as this.

Known as the "Agency Plains Special" this type of temporary house is popular in newly-irrigated areas because it reduces investment in housing and outbuildings to the lowest possible figure while the farmer and his family become established.

Oregon State college rural housing specialists, however, urge farmers building this type of structure not to make the mistake of putting it on the site for their permanent home. After a permanent home is built, living quarters in the "special" are intended to become storage space for grain or other crops, or they may be opened into added machinery storage. Some farmers use theirs to house harvest or permanent hired help.

The building shown is designed to take standard 24-foot trussed rafters. This makes it suited for construction with war surplus trussed rafters which are still available. Building length may be varied to fit needs of individual farmers since it is readily extended in 12-foot lengths.

Living area in the plan shown is 24 feet square. A building of this size, 25 by 60 feet, will cost between $2,000 and $3,000. It is suggested that builders to not "over-build" the living quarters to a point where their investment will postpone construction of a permanent home.

Complete plans for the "Agency Plains Special" which include two sheets of drawings and a bill of materials may be ordered from the Oregon Farmhouse Plan Service, Oregon State college. Ask for plan number 148; enclose 85 cents.
