CONSCRIPT EVERYTHING IN WAR

Should war begin on a world-wide scale, the Pilot would recommend that men, money and business should be mobilized, thus eliminating any possibility of war debts, war profits, and such. In other words, the Pilot recommends total conscription. Profits from business should go toward the war effort and the managers or owners should be given soldier's pay.

Sounds fantastic, but it is not quite as fantastic as that facing the lad who goes through training for war with no assurance of coming home. He's the hero in war and the forgotten man soon afterwards. Total conscription would eliminate this, would keep everyone on the same plane—on an equality.

Before the beginning of this last conflict, this write advocated such action, and was laughed down by many. The ones who ridiculed so loudly, today are broke, or are close to it. Their war profits did them little or no good.

A tycoon running a lucrative business has no right to reap big profits when his employees sons face death every moment of the day—he is entitled to no greater pay than the officers who lead the men at the front. His business should carry its proportionate load of the war expense—then there will be equality.
