Along Azalea Row

By B. Miller

Crowded Out Last Week

The philosopher of Weedy Acres has taken fishing pole in hand and gone off to join the neighbors at the mouth of the Chetco River. The pelicans are perched on Fountain Rock for the same reason. I wonder how the word gets spread around among the feathered population that the fishin' is good. When one pelican takes wing do the others say, "I'll go too?" Or does the leader give the world?

Speaking of leaders, Clara Kerns, president of Azalea Garden club, and her staunch supporters, Martha Grayshel and Martha Harbin, have been rewarded for the bulb sale last week at the regular garden club meeting. Remember, bulbs planted now bring beauty in the springtime!

There is pleasure in knowing how to do this well, even though we often are too busy—or think we are—to do more than run into the garden, cut some posies and plunk them into a vase. However, we are professional flower growers here, and near professional in the use of flowers and should be proud of the fact. Florists take this kind of thing very seriously. They hold schools of design. One of our former residents is distinguishing himself in this field.

We are all pleased when we hear of some former Brookings or Harbor resident who is making good "outside" as we call the world beyond the scope of our own gentle mountain barriers.

Of interest to Chetco Valley residents was the recent issue of Florists' Review Magazine which reported on the convention of the Northwest Florists Association held at Sun Valley during latter part of September.

At this meeting, James Crissey—former resident—now engaged in business in Seattle, was picked first vice-president of the association, which brings him in line for the presidency next year.

TRAP SHOOT

Young Crissey was a participant in the national school for design sponsored by the Society of American Florists which met Aug. 2, in the Statler Hotel, in New York City. During Northwest Florists Association meeting, he set up a school for design, bringing back many of his own ideas and those of others from the New York meeting to Sun Valley.

Otto Panzer, brother of Al Panzer of this community, was elected director of the association for the State of Oregon at the Sun Valley meeting.

Convening at the same time at Sun Valley, the Wholesalers' Association decided to meet again at Portland in November, together with the daffodil growers of the Brookings-Harbor area to discuss the marketing of field grown daffodil blossoms.
