

WASHINGTON WEEK
By Harris Ellsworth, M. C.
Since this session of congresses began everyone, including the majority leadership, has known that the price and wage control law passed last fall would expire at the end of June. Many people and especially the administration forces which control the congress, were anxious to have the control law extended and made even sharper. They really want controls. But somehow they just haven't been able to get the extension legislation ready. Finally the bill was reported—and what a bill! It comes to the floor of the house with some 57 amendments to be offered by the committee. It reached the floor Wednesday afternoon with the expiration deadline Saturday night.

Everyone finally conceded that the 57 amendments, plus such amendments as may be offered on the floor, could not be debated and the bill passed by the deadline. You see, when a bill is read for amendment under what is called the five-minute rule, any number of members may be recognized by the speaker to talk five minutes on each amendment. Sometimes the time is limited by action of the house but even so each amendment would require not less than ten minutes. In addition, consideration of the bill began with five whole hours of general debate.

Well anyway, after fussing and fuming over the control bill for weeks and months, it was finally necessary to pass an emergency temporary extension of the old law. What will happen to the hodge-podge bill reported by the committee remains to be seen.

In a recent letter I mentioned also what has been happening to the regular appropriations bills. These bills have been delayed longer this year than in any previous year in recent history. The spenders have a reason for this—and they control the committee on appropriations. The reason is, as mentioned briefly in a recent letter, that for every month the passage of the new bills for the coming fiscal year can be delayed, the departments and agencies can spend more money. The reason is that they can spend at last year's rate of appropriation. In most instances the money allowed for the coming fiscal year is less.

Speaking of spending, latest figures show that there are 2,409,121 employees on the payrolls of the federal government—which grew during the 12-months April, 1950 at the rate of 6,073 per week. The trend is continuing. At present the civilian payroll of the federal government is eight and a third billions a year—equalling the peak payroll during World War 2 when 13 million men were under arms and the United States was engaged in an all-out effort of war.

Of course we want our chief executive to have the best in facilities and luxuries. He has a position which involves terrific mental and physical strain. I find no fault with the idea of our president having a private yacht at his disposal which he may use for trips and for rest and relaxation. However, we are doing that job on a pretty grand basis. A member of the house appropriations committee looked into the matter not long ago and made the following report in his letter to his district:

"A couple of weeks ago I pointed out the pull that the yacht, Williamsburg, has. My committee work deals with the cost of operating the navy—I got curious. I found that the navy keeps eight officers and 156 enlisted men on duty to keep the yacht ready to go. That costs you taxpayers $450,000 a year. Supplies, fuel and ordinary repairs runs about $50,000. With a few minor items, you will find it costs Uncle Sam's taxpayers over a half million dollars to provide President Truman his week-end relaxation on the Potomac."

Adventists Book July Camp Meeting

The camp meeting, held annually by the Seventh-Day Adventists at the Gladstone park, just south of Portland, is again the focal point of interests for all Adventists in the Oregon Conference, which takes in western Oregon and southern Washington.

Fourteen members of the local Seventh-Day Adventist church are planning to attend from July 19 to 29, inclusive.

Elder Lloyd E. Biggs, recently-re-elected president of the conference, states that he anticipates another record attendance this year. The 73-acre campground with its housing capacity in cabin and tents for almost 7000 will be filled during the week with a total of 150000.

Katherine's Beauty Shop will be closed from July 18 to Aug. 1.
