

Frenchman Studies Life In United States On Three-Months Extended Bus Tour

Jean Boyer, a 26-year-old French clergyman, on tour of the United States, stopped three days over the weekend in Brookings, guest at the Hotel Brookings, on a Greyhound tour. His interview with the Pilot was interesting, as much as he was able to tell in his broken English. His perception of this country was, however, not hampered by his lack of speaking ability.

He flew from London to Ireland, where the plane was grounded by motor trouble, visited spots in that country; spent three days in Iceland; thence to New York, from where an aunt financed a Greyhound tour of the United States, taking around the perimeter of the country, with stop-offs wherever he desires.

From Brookings he expects to visit San Francisco, Los Angeles, before going to San Antonio, Texas, and New Orleans. His itinerary includes Florida before returning to New York, the trip to require at least two more months before his visa is expired and he must sail.

"America is so great—it has so much industry. In comparison to my country, your plywood plant would be at least two or more years under construction. Here, you expect to have it in operation by January 1.

"In my country workers are paid such low wages. It requires three months wages to buy a refrigerator; and other things in proportion. Your workers make more in one day than most of ours do in a week.

"In your country there are two major parties; our is divided among seven, most of which have about equal strength. We do not have the unity. We do not have an opportunity to take part in our governmental functions—all Europe, for that matter, is much the same."

Boyer is making the tour, that he, in his ministry, may better acquaint his parish with this nation, that he may bring about a better understanding and the ultimate goal of peace in face of the Communist threat to the globe.
