Homemaker

During this last week I have had time to browse about a bit in grocery and other stores of this area. Here again are found many changes in the last year.

Engaging E. E. Hanscam & Sons, owners of the Harbor store, in conversation, it is interesting to learn about their expansion program which was deemed necessary recently. By the enlargement of the floor space the different departments are set aside and are grouped attractively so that the wares and food stuffs show off to advantage and are easily viewed and examined by the customer.

Nowhere could one find more courteous and willing people to serve you. Those in charge are friendly, taking time to give you the advantages of their experience.

At the Harbor store you will find practically all of your wants supplied. It is the nearest to a department store this area has to offer. This is definitely a one-stop store.

Again one is struck by changes in Brookings as one approaches Freeman's Market. The large plate glass windows gives one a feeling of openness and space where all is in full view. Have you ever eaten at a restaurant where the food is cooked, broiled or barbecued before your eyes? Did you like it? As you pass by, it is a nice sight to look in and see customers leisurely strolling here and there with their carts, choosing their groceries from the well-marked supplies on easily accessible shelves and racks.

During rush hours there is still sufficient space to take care of great numbers of busy people in the wide aisles and around the checking counter. And speaking of checking at Freeman's your groceries are carefully checked and packaged so that when you arrive home your eggs are not cracked and the fresh bakery goods you admired on the shelf is in its original shape.

Upon entering Redfield's Market one is immediately conscious of the friendly atmosphere of the store. To some people this may not mean a great deal but to others it is everything. The world is still traveling at a slow enough speed, thank goodness, that people are still able to enjoy a few words of exchange as they meet at Redfield's.

How is this friendly feeling brought about? Perhaps it is primarily brought about because all those in charge radiate friendliness and not only that they actually feel it. Try and get ahead of Mr. Wilbanks at the meat department. Who knows, he may "lift" many a busy homemaker or tired woodsman in the course of the day with his ever ready smile and helpful attitude.

Homemakers, intelligent as they are today, are quick to grasp the advantage of an ad appearing weekly in your local newspaper by which they plan their menus in advance.

Mr. and Mrs. Redfield are sailing today for the Orient on a vacation trip, confident that during their absence the market will be in capable hands. Lyle has had considerable experience in the grocery work before coming to be with his father. I'm sure all those who have met the Redfields wish them well on their journey.

Upon leaving the market you are glad you have been able to park in a convenient and safe parking space provided by the foresightedness of the Redfields.
