ORGANIC FERTILIZATION versus chemical fertilizers is the basis for this experiment with tobacco plants being carried on at the Nutrilite Research Laboratories in Buena Park, California. The smaller plant on the right has been growing the same length of time as its competitor on the left, and under similar conditions, except that it was planted in soil which was treated with chemical fertilizers. The apparently healthier plant on the left was nurtured in organic compost and silica sand. Comparing the leaves is Ralph Cramer, who conducted the experiment in the agricultural experiment department of the laboratory.
