GADWALLS

Gadwals are sleepy in the daytime. When the sun is out, they spend most of time dozing in the thick grass of marshlands. Only a sudden noise would make them look for a safer spot.

At dusk, the big birds come to life. From twilight until long after dark, they feed around the edges of lonely lakes and streams and in nearby fields. There they feast on tender water plants, insects, snails, small fish, tadpoles, nuts and grain.

By the time dawn begins to break, they have eaten their fill and are ready to turn in for a day's rest. Back they go to the marshes, where human beings seldom bother them or their nests.

They build their homes near the water, says the National Wildlife Federation, but always on dry ground. Under a bush or on a broad clump of grass, they collect finely shredded grass for the outer part of the nest. In the center they add a lining of feathers.

Gadwall

The soft nest is finished and ready for use by May. In it the female lays from eight to twelve large, pale buff or creamy eggs.
She sits on them for twenty-eight days to make them hatch.

From their parents, the young quickly learn to be shy, wary ducks. They not only hide and sleep by day, but they also are alert at swimming and diving.
The snap of a twig or the flash of a gun is enough to send them plunging for cover.

When fully grown, Gadwalls are about twenty-two inches long, and they weigh two pounds or a little more. In flight they can spread their wings to a total width of thirty-five inches.

Brownish gray is the main color on the male. At the back edges of his wings he has clear patches of white within a border of black and brown. On his back and in his tail there are black feathers, but the tip of his tail is gray. His lower neck is dark gray, and farther down he is white. His bill is blue and his legs are dull orange.

The female is about the same color, but darker, with more brown mixed in her gray feathers.

She is also a bit smaller than the male, and does not make as much noise when she quacks as he does with his loud, shrill kack-kack.

Summer and winter, Gadwalls are birds of the Northern Hemisphere. They spend the spring and summer in Canada, along the Pacific Coast, and eastward into Iowa, Colorado, Minnesota, Ohio, New Mexico, Utah, Texas, and Louisiana. A few of them remain in southern Canada for the winter, while others fly to such scattered places as Maryland, Lower California, Mexico and southern Florida.
