By CLIFFORD P. ROWE

While you will not find the information included in any hunting bulletins, September marks the beginning of an "open season" which lasts longer and has more devotees than are found in any other spare time sport.

The beauty of this pastime is that anyone may participate regardless of age or qualifications. Although records show that those getting the most pleasure out of the activity are parents, lack of children need not discourage those wishing to get in on the fun. The only requirement absolutely essential is that one should have some source of information, reliable or otherwise. In many cases, a vivid imagination may be used as a substitute. The season officially opens with the first day of school when the game being sought comes out of a three months' hibernation and takes up a defensive position behind what is commonly referred to as "teacher's desk." At his or her appearance the command is given to "Fire at Will" or "Fire at Mary" as the case may be, and the chase is on.

Best hunting days are those when report cards are distributed. Most experienced hunters hold their fire until the end of the first six weeks in order to discover those most vulnerable to attack. Some of those being hunted catch on quickly and discover that high grades give them protection; others, believing in some fantastic principle which they refer to as "standards," send low grades home when deserved and then lie low in the brush for the next six weeks or until shot.

Sex seems to have little bearing, with bucks and does held equally good targets. Does, particularly young ones, are the most popular prey for women hunters while a type of bucks labeled "conches" draws the most fire from the male nimrods. All claim, however, that their main interest in the sport is based on looking out for the welfare of their youth.

So until next June, fellow hunters, it's "Tally-ho," good hunting, and try not to hurt any children in the process.

Hammond Organs Now Available

On her return from Klamath Falls the first of the week, Mrs. Ross Putnam reported to the Pilot that she has one Hammond organ for immediate delivery and others available October 1. Mrs. Putnam has made these organs, as well as the Wurlitzer pianos available to the public for some months and can supply the larger B model Hammond to those wishing a larger model. A fine musician herself, she has given the community much enjoyment through music furnished for many public functions in this area.
