For What It's Worth

By CLIFFORD P. ROWE
SOME DAY, when I find the necessary time, I am going to do some investigating in order to ordeal before receiving their diplomas.

I have already studied very carefully the requirements for grade school, high school and college and nowhere do I find the statement that the candidate for a diploma must as a final test undergo the agony of an hour of determine just how the tradition of having commencement speakers came into being. This research will be done, of course, in the interest of the thousands upon thousands of graduates who each year are forced to endure this final commencement oratory. The student is told early that he must make passing marks in his studies, must pass his final examination, and must accumulate a specified number of credits or hours; but he is never warned of that last grueling test—the commencement address.

The omission of this information by those in charge may be a stroke of genius on their part in the cause of universal education. I am confident that if the young victims were forewarned, our schols of today would be bursting at the seams with enrollees; rather our younger generation would embark on some other activity which promised a happier conclusion.

Be that as it may, commencement speakers are on the increase; and as their numbers multiply, the length of their speeches grow longer. In fact I wouldn't be a bit surprised if, before many years have passed, the waste of time involved in passing out diplomas will be eliminated entirely and the evening given over exclusively to the words of wisdom from the so-called expert from out-of-town.

I can see but one answer for the problem: television. Diplomas will be mailed to the graduates and the commencement address will be televised into the students' homes. The fact that a majority of the graduates will not have television will be the strongest argument for my plan. The evening can then be spent much more profitably in opening
