factories and the mills, rolling and gaining volume until it comes to us from the homes of common men. Do these murmurs echo in the corridors of the universities? I have not heard them."

People come first; education follows. The American language is not created by professors or books, but rather by the American people. Similarly, educational needs are not created by educators but by the people who are to be educated.

I SUPPOSE ONE really shouldn't be too upset by the constant griping of our populace relative to the educational system. This dissatisfaction in itself can be taken as an indication that all are not asleep and that some are still concerned for the future.

When one eliminates the purely personal and selfish criticisms, the remainder seem to be centered around the old, old controversial issue: Shall the education program be patterned after that of yesterday or that of today or that of tomorrow?

And so we have the dreamers rant rationally favoring an educational system designed to cope with a civilization which is in reality nothing more than a figment of their imaginations.

In contrast are the ghosts of the past with their haunting wail of "what was good enough for me is good enough for my kids."

In between the two are the realists who feel that we should work with what we've got and let the future take care of itself.

I will string along with the latter. Cherishing that knowledge which has survived the past and at the same time keeping our gaze low enough that we will not miss that which is under our very noses will guarantee our future.

Woodrow Wilson warned against an educational system based on fantasy when he wrote, "The great voice of America does not come from the seats of learning. It comes in a murmur from the hills and woods and farms and
