

Smudge Pot Use Sought In State For Mill Residue

Fruit and vegetable growers in Oregon may be saved losses from frost damages as a result of an orchard heating study using sawmill residues now underway at the Oregon Forest Products laboratory.

Stanley E. Corder, engineer of the investigation, reported a $5,000,000 loss was caused this year by frost damage to orchards in the Rogue river valley alone. The Willamette and Hood River valleys are also frost damage areas.

Oil heaters—smudge pots—are used now for forest protection. The fuel is expensive and the heavy smoke produced in use is highly objectionable.

In some areas, large volumes of sawmill residues are available for use as fuel. Means for storing and transporting this fuel and development of satisfactory burning methods may make heat now lost in sawmill burners available to orchard owners.

It is planned to conduct field tests before next frost season on the more promising methods of using wood residues to prevent frost damage.

New Home Heating Is Introduced Here

From the Maginot line to the Modern home is the theme developed on a new type of radiant glass heating, which is being introduced in Brookings by the Curry County Lumber Co.

The heating arrangement, called Glassheat, was developed by the French when they wanted an odorless, safe efficient method of heating the underground passages of their Maginot Line.

Glassheat heats through glass panels in which electrical elements are embodied. For the Maginot Line the heat had to be that which did not burn the oxygen or endanger explosives. It requires no circulation of dust-laden air, and provides life giving rays to the atmosphere.

In appearance, Continental Glassheat is a glass panel framed in aluminum to be set in or attached to a wall or baseboard. Fused in strong tempered glass that will stand up to 27,000 pounds pressure per square inch are continuous aluminum alloy grids that send out the infra-red or "sunshine" rays that warm the body directly and the air secondarily.

The system eliminates the need for radiators, pipes, stoves or furnaces and installation costs are low.
