A couple of Brookings Plywood men won the ham and turkey given away at "Bart the Butcher's" grand opening, held last week.

Highways Carry More Traffic

Oregon highways carried close to 20 percent more traffic last month according to volume data from automatic recorders compiled by the state highway department.

The recorders, permanently installed at key points along rural highways, clocked sizeable traffic increases at almost every location as compared with counts for last year at the same time.

Heaviest rural traffic was recorded south of Woodburn on highway 99E where the January volume averaged 7,537 vehicles a day, was up 24 percent from January of 1953. The sharpest increase was a 64 percent gain on the Columbia river highway near Troutdale.

Urban traffic in Portland and Salem also gained eight and one-half percent during the month, recorders showed.

While traffic was heavier, Oregon drivers managed to hold fatal accidents at the same level of the preceding January. Secretary of State Earl T. Newberry reported. Fatalities totaled 22, exactly even with the 22 deaths charged to traffic at the same time a year ago.
