

FOR WHAT IT'S WORTH

By CLIFFORD ROWE

Just as surely as June rolls around, the nation's writers, in their eagerness to earn an easy dollar, begin to fill the magazine with advice to young couples contemplating matrimony.

And while no one would take seriously any writer's opinion on international matters unless he were an authority in the field, the prevailing attitude seems to be that anyone, regardless of qualifications, can pass out words of counsel relative to the proper selection of a mate.

The questionnaire is the most popular form. The marriage candidate is asked to evaluate her suitor relative to the questions, to add the affirmative and negative responses, and then she can either make plans for opening a charge account in his name or kindly inform him that he has flunked the test.

What worries me most about this method is that I am afraid that some potential brides-to-be may take it too seriously, forgetting that the only valid test is the old-fashioned one of being in love. If in love, they can get little aid from subjecting themselves to crazy questions thought up by some crack-pot whose only interest is in getting his article published.

As I see it, the principal value in the article is that they provide a great deal of entertainment for those already hitched. Wives can get much satisfaction out of reading the questions to hubby, along with her answers to same; thus impressing on the gentleman in question how lucky it was that she accepted him before reading the article. And her partner can, without too much effort, unearth a similar list of questions which he can use to prove that according to science she should have been an old maid.

But for the unmarried, I would contend that to analyze one's future partner in wedlock would take most of the joy out of marriage. That's where the adventure comes in. It's much the same as reaching into a grab-bag, not knowing what the prize is going to be. Whatever the prize, as far as marriage is concerned, one can learn to adjust, and so doing will discover that the adjustment can be more exciting than would be the case in living with perfect perfection.

WOOD (Continued from Page 2) and say that I have done all I can today. I was excited and I captured that excitement and organized it with knowledge. However at the very pitch of my excitement I lost all consciousness of time formal considerations of picture making, and even forgot I was hungry. It was this high pitch of enthusiasm that kept me glued to the picture until it was finished.

The clock and it is past midnight the clock and it is past midnight and I started to go down to fix dinner about five o'clock. As I sit down to study the picture I'm not sure whether I like it or not. So I say "Oh well, I'll take a look at it tomorrow. I will decide then whether to use it as a sketch for another picture, keep it as is, or paint it over. I know this much, the minute the picture becomes so precious in my own mind, it starts to become superficial, and dishonest. In order to be truly honest and direct, I must feel free to kick a hole through it at any time. That is why I use the cheapest canvass and paint that I can get. A good frame, canvass, and good paint in themselves are not art.
