FOR WHAT IT'S WORTH

By CLIFFORD ROWE

For those searching for a hobby which is educational and at the same time entertaining, I would recommend that they make a study of the techniques employed by politicians on a high level. By analyzing their every move, one can soon perceive a definite pattern which they employ to gain votes.

In order to save time, I would suggest that they ignore the more obvious ones such as kissing the babies, and passing out cigars. These methods have become so recognizable that only amateurs are crude enough to practise them. Rather, their antics in the press will provide a more fertile field of research.

Just take our own junior senator for example. Now that Richard, the Headline Hearted is home from his first crusade in the nation's capital, ample material will without doubt soon be available for the researcher in this field. In fact, it is probably too bad that the scrap book couldn't have been started when the senator's headquarters were in the press rooms in Washington, D. C.

His vote-getting began to shape up rapidly there. Of course, it will take some tricky thinking to figure out his motive for defending the squirrels on the White House grounds, particularly when one takes into consideration the fact, that in Oregon, at least, squirrels are not eligible to vote.

Other antics, however, will not be so difficult to analyze. His move to grant bonuses to mothers for each child was definitely an attempt to strengthen his position with the female voter, although indirectly it might even bring in votes from a few timid males. Likewise his public confession that the people really voted for his wife rather than for him, while it has treacherous aspects, should put him in solid with another bloc of ladies who have long felt that they were responsible for their husband's successes.

Now that he is home, I predict that he will devote most of his time endeavoring to convince the people of the state of Oregon that almost single-handed he tried to defeat every bill submitted by a wicked Republican administration. He will be distant enough from the battlefield to make it convincing; and if the senior senator will only stay in Washington, Junior should have the front pages practically all to himself.
