CAMPING ON A NATIONAL FOREST

Last year, more than 40 million visits to the national forests were made by recreationalists from all states of the Union for camping, picnicking, fishing, hunting, swimming, skiing, hiking, riding and numerous other outdoor activities.

To make these visits more pleasant the Forest Service of the U. S. Department of Agriculture has provided 4,400 improved camping and picnicking grounds, 210 winter sports areas, 190 swimming places, and 120,000 miles of trail for hiking and horseback. In addition, 79 wilderness, wild and primitive areas totalling 14 million acres have been set aside for those who want to get completely away from the auto horns of the roadside and the jingle of the telephone.

The spending done by millions of national forest recreational users is an important source of income to local business. The is so heavy at many of these areas that caretakers are unable to provide for adequate cleanups. The Forest Service, which is observing its Golden Anniversary this year, urges each user to do a bit more than his or her share to protect these recreation areas against damage and to help in keeping them clean and neat.

As population rises and modern civilization becomes more complex there will be increasing public demand for the many forms of healthful outdoor recreation which our national forests afford and which everyone needs for spiritual and physical well being.
