

IT'S WORTH FOR WHAT

By CLIFFORD P. ROWE

In spite of the sentiment behind the occasion, wedding anniversaries come in for more than their rightful share of good-natured joking. Probably one reason they are so often the butt of humor is that there is no one season of the year to which such witticisms need be restricted. For some reason or another couples seem to be getting married every day without any particular regard for the calendar.

One thing which puzzles me, though, is that the husband and his absent-mindedness where such anniversaries are concerned seems to be the principal target of such jests. For example, one anecdote coming my way recently concerned itself with the husband who, dashing out of the house on his way to work, was queried by his spouse as to whether he knew what day it was.

The poor fellow, knowing his weakness for forgetting wedding anniversaries, quickly retorted that he certainly did, gave his wife a more enthusiastic parting kiss than customary; and then that evening returned with a gift, took the dear lady out to dinner and, all in all, made it a royal occasion. On their return home, she informed him that she had never enjoyed such a wonderful Groundhog's Day in all her life.

Such is the sort of thing we hear daily about poor husbands. But the point I have never been able to get across to myself is why the husband should be the one who, in addition to remembering, must go all out on this memorable occasion. Is the male member of the partnership the only one who has reason to show appreciation?

Surely, if one is to judge by the emphasis placed on the bride's role in the wedding festivities, she is the one who is celebrating a day of triumph and so should be the one to assume the aggressive role in commemorating the anniversary of the event. Just because the husband is so engrossed in bringing in the daily bread that one day is much the same as the one before and after should be an excuse for labeling him as one who is inconsiderate and unappreciate.

For my part, I showed marked improvement this year. I only missed our anniversary date by two days.
