It is hard to believe that this charming modern foyer, large enough to double as a second sitting room for the family, formerly was the antiquated entrance hall pictured at right. The transformation from an old-fashioned entry with outmoded, dust-catching decor, to a room that gives visitors a bright and spacious first impression of the home, was achieved by using new, improved building materials at a comparatively small cost.

The unusual modernization plan of the foyer was designed by Kim Hoffman and Stephen Hedrich, nationally known interior designers, who used the rich sunset colors of creamy beige, Etruscan red, gunmetal and antique gold to establish an atmosphere of friendliness and simple dignity.

The overly ornate paneling of the walls was covered with Georgia-Pacific Ripplewood, textured 4' x 8' panels which were installed easily and quickly. This textured plywood paneling also was used to enclose the heavily carved staircase and to modernize the entrance door, replacing the overabundance of decorative details with a clean contemporary look.

A Two-Tone Textured Finish
The rich natural grain texture of the Ripplewood was finished in a soft two-tone beige and white paint combination, making an effective background for the rest of the decor scheme. These panels can be installed by a do-it-yourself home craftsman during leisure hours, and a two-tone paint finish applied by any adult who can wield a brush.

The finishing procedure is simple. First, a coat of creamy beige paint was applied to the paneling and allowed to dry thoroughly. Then a second coat of stark white paint was brushed on, and partially wiped off before it dried.

By using the modern lines of the newel post as the center of interest for the design of resilient flooring, which radiates in bold widening strips of gunmetal, Etruscan red and creamy beige, the designers proved that a fireplace is not necessarily the only focal point in a room.

The stairway handrail and newel post top were painted Etruscan red. A painting with an antique gold finished frame hangs over the weathered brick fireplace and slate flagstone hearth, lit by a pair of antique gold lacquered cone lamps. The antique gold chandelier cones are pierced by numerous small holes to diffuse the light.

Plywood was used for the base of the mica-black tile coffee table, and for the legs and frame of the mustard gold upholstered contour sofa.
