Motorlog Leads to Jacksonville, Storehouse of Pioneer Memories

Old Courthouse In Mining Town Used as Museum

The following is a condensation of a motorlog appearing in Northwest Rotogravure magazine of The Sunday Oregonian. It is one of an annual series sponsored jointly by The Oregonian and the Oregon State Motor Association.

In Jacksonville, Oregon has a potential rival for Nevada's famed tourist attraction, Virginia City. For the tree-shaded streets of this old southern Oregon mining town, a few miles west of Medford, are lined with the shells of pioneer buildings.

As we found on a motorlog for The Oregonian and the Oregon State Motor Association, among many other attractions there are graceful old churches, one of them the first Protestant church built west of the Rocky mountains.

The old United States hotel, where President Rutherford B. Hayes was an overnight guest on his stage coach trip through the Rogue River valley, was in its heyday the finest to be found in a wide area.

There are other public buildings, and lovely old homes, most of them dating back to the 1850s, when Jacksonville was overcoming its growing pains as an early mining town, and becoming a well established community.

Old Homes Predominate

Some of these old homes are still in use; but for the most part, Jacksonville today is just another small community living among ghost buildings.

One of the old buildings that is playing a new role in present day Jacksonville is the stately red brick courthouse. This was built in 1884, on the site of the original wooden courthouse, which had been erected in the middle '30s and burned in the '80s.

It served as the court of justice until the late '20s when Medford succeeded Jacksonville as the county seat.

In 1950, historical material which had been collected by the Southern Oregon Historical society, Inc., and housed in the old hotel, was moved into the courthouse. Now it's the official museum, open week days from 10 a. m. to 5 p. m. and from 2 to 5 p. m. on Sundays.

United States hotel, at right in this early-day Jacksonville street scene by pioneer cameraman Peter Britt, still stands.

Most recent of its acquisitions are furnishings from the home of the late Peter Britt, early Swiss pioneer who settled in Jackson in 1852 and became the first photographer in southern Oregon.

By far the most interesting part of this collection is the assortment of early cameras Britt used, not only in his portrait studio, but also for his scenic work.

Nearly all of his cameras are Voigtlanders, ranging in size from the 4x5 box camera he brought with him from Switzerland to later models, which include a huge 11x14 job that more resembles a small cannon than a camera.

There is even a stereo camera, with a large viewing box and hundreds and hundreds of plates that may take years to classify and identify.

As time permits, Miss Mary Hanley, curator of the Jacksonville museum, plans to reconstruct Peter Britt's portrait studio in one of the museum rooms, and have it set up with cameras, posing chairs and various backdrops.

Britt is reported to have been the first photographer to make a picture of Crater Lake, first discovered in 1853. He literally had to build the road to the lake in the early '70s. It was not until 1874 that he made his first photograph of the lake.

According to the story, he spent nearly a week at the rim waiting for good weather and was finally forced to make an exposure of several hours.

Jacksville is just five miles west of Medford, now a thriving county seat of Jackson county, 289 miles south of Portland on U. S. highway 99.

White motorlog car paused amid majesty of redwoods along Smith river to coast.

A pleasant round trip from Portland that can comfortably be made in a long week end would be down 99 to Medford, then across to Jacksonville and on through the Applegate valley to join U. S. highway 199 south to Crescent City, Cal., and return north on scenic U. S. 101 to Portland. A suggested bypass over an old highway north of Crescent City through the Smith River cut-off to Brookings will save a few miles.

Another suggested stopover on U. S. 199 to the coast is the Oregon Caves, 20 miles east of Cave Junction. The road from Medford to Crater Lake, some 81 miles, is kept open throughout the year, although there are no accommodations available at the lake until mid-June.
